Een wonderstille, rustige Nederlandsche Vissersdorp, het is een van de eeuwenoude, zij hebben een bijzonder romantisch uitziende.
The Zuid-Afrikaan.

CAPE TOWN, SEPTEMBER 26, 1851.

Two over-rated advantages which the various gums of news are always ready to mention, and which we hope will be sufficiently disapproved from the very commencement of our columns. The Colonel and Colenso. The prospect of a reduction in the severity of taxation, the anticipated process of devolution of the grievances of the congregation, and the possibility of progress in the social advancement of the nation, are all entertained with the highest degree of confidence by the people of the colony. To be sure, the last is to be expected from a failure of the Union of Great Britain, that would be the greatest advantage of the colony. But it is to be expected that the grievance will be remedied by the construction of a new railroad, and that the social advancement will be the result of the union of the people of the colony.

The colonists of England are greatly disappointed in the expectations which they have entertained. They expected a reduction in the severity of taxation, and they expected the grievance of the congregation to be remedied by the construction of a new railroad. They expected the social advancement of the nation to be the result of the union of the people of the colony. But it is to be expected that the grievance will be remedied by the construction of a new railroad, and that the social advancement will be the result of the union of the people of the colony.

The government of England is greatly disappointed in the expectations which it has entertained. It expected a reduction in the severity of taxation, and it expected the grievance of the congregation to be remedied by the construction of a new railroad. It expected the social advancement of the nation to be the result of the union of the people of the colony. But it is to be expected that the grievance will be remedied by the construction of a new railroad, and that the social advancement will be the result of the union of the people of the colony.

The Zuid-Afrikaan.

CAPE TOWN, SEPTEMBER 26, 1851.

Two over-rated advantages which the various gums of news are always ready to mention, and which we hope will be sufficiently disapproved from the very commencement of our columns. The Colonel and Colenso. The prospect of a reduction in the severity of taxation, the anticipated process of devolution of the grievances of the congregation, and the possibility of progress in the social advancement of the nation, are all entertained with the highest degree of confidence by the people of the colony. To be sure, the last is to be expected from a failure of the Union of Great Britain, that would be the greatest advantage of the colony. But it is to be expected that the grievance will be remedied by the construction of a new railroad, and that the social advancement will be the result of the union of the people of the colony.

The colonists of England are greatly disappointed in the expectations which they have entertained. They expected a reduction in the severity of taxation, and they expected the grievance of the congregation to be remedied by the construction of a new railroad. They expected the social advancement of the nation to be the result of the union of the people of the colony. But it is to be expected that the grievance will be remedied by the construction of a new railroad, and that the social advancement will be the result of the union of the people of the colony.

The government of England is greatly disappointed in the expectations which it has entertained. It expected a reduction in the severity of taxation, and it expected the grievance of the congregation to be remedied by the construction of a new railroad. It expected the social advancement of the nation to be the result of the union of the people of the colony. But it is to be expected that the grievance will be remedied by the construction of a new railroad, and that the social advancement will be the result of the union of the people of the colony.

The Zuid-Afrikaan.

CAPE TOWN, SEPTEMBER 26, 1851.

Two over-rated advantages which the various gums of news are always ready to mention, and which we hope will be sufficiently disapproved from the very commencement of our columns. The Colonel and Colenso. The prospect of a reduction in the severity of taxation, the anticipated process of devolution of the grievances of the congregation, and the possibility of progress in the social advancement of the nation, are all entertained with the highest degree of confidence by the people of the colony. To be sure, the last is to be expected from a failure of the Union of Great Britain, that would be the greatest advantage of the colony. But it is to be expected that the grievance will be remedied by the construction of a new railroad, and that the social advancement will be the result of the union of the people of the colony.

The colonists of England are greatly disappointed in the expectations which they have entertained. They expected a reduction in the severity of taxation, and they expected the grievance of the congregation to be remedied by the construction of a new railroad. They expected the social advancement of the nation to be the result of the union of the people of the colony. But it is to be expected that the grievance will be remedied by the construction of a new railroad, and that the social advancement will be the result of the union of the people of the colony.

The government of England is greatly disappointed in the expectations which it has entertained. It expected a reduction in the severity of taxation, and it expected the grievance of the congregation to be remedied by the construction of a new railroad. It expected the social advancement of the nation to be the result of the union of the people of the colony. But it is to be expected that the grievance will be remedied by the construction of a new railroad, and that the social advancement will be the result of the union of the people of the colony.

The Zuid-Afrikaan.

CAPE TOWN, SEPTEMBER 26, 1851.

Two over-rated advantages which the various gums of news are always ready to mention, and which we hope will be sufficiently disapproved from the very commencement of our columns. The Colonel and Colenso. The prospect of a reduction in the severity of taxation, the anticipated process of devolution of the grievances of the congregation, and the possibility of progress in the social advancement of the nation, are all entertained with the highest degree of confidence by the people of the colony. To be sure, the last is to be expected from a failure of the Union of Great Britain, that would be the greatest advantage of the colony. But it is to be expected that the grievance will be remedied by the construction of a new railroad, and that the social advancement will be the result of the union of the people of the colony.

The colonists of England are greatly disappointed in the expectations which they have entertained. They expected a reduction in the severity of taxation, and they expected the grievance of the congregation to be remedied by the construction of a new railroad. They expected the social advancement of the nation to be the result of the union of the people of the colony. But it is to be expected that the grievance will be remedied by the construction of a new railroad, and that the social advancement will be the result of the union of the people of the colony.

The government of England is greatly disappointed in the expectations which it has entertained. It expected a reduction in the severity of taxation, and it expected the grievance of the congregation to be remedied by the construction of a new railroad. It expected the social advancement of the nation to be the result of the union of the people of the colony. But it is to be expected that the grievance will be remedied by the construction of a new railroad, and that the social advancement will be the result of the union of the people of the colony.