Cape Town, September 2, 1861.

Copy of an Order:—What does it signify? A question which I have asked several times within the last week, and which we shall all return to the same answer. It is a question of the most extraordinary nature, and one which I think would be difficult to answer even by the most sage and experienced statesman. It is a question which has arisen in the most unexpected circumstances, and which has caused the utmost confusion and dismay among the people of this country.

The cause of the disturbance is explained as follows:—The Cape Government, in order to maintain order and tranquility, has decided to impose certain restrictions on the freedom of the press. These restrictions are based on the belief that the press is used by certain individuals to spread false and inflammatory statements, which are likely to cause public disorder.

The Cape Government, therefore, has issued an order prohibiting the publication of any article that may be considered to be false or inflammatory. This order is intended to prevent the spread of false and inflammatory statements, and to ensure the maintenance of peace and order in the country.

However, the order has met with strong opposition from the press, which considers it a violation of freedom of speech. The press has published a series of articles opposing the order, and has called for its immediate repeal.

The Cape Government, therefore, is left with the difficult task of maintaining order and tranquility while ensuring the freedom of the press. This is a delicate balance, and one that requires careful consideration.

In conclusion, the question of what does it signify? remains unanswered. The Cape Government has issued an order to prevent the publication of false and inflammatory statements, but this has met with strong opposition from the press. The government is left with the difficult task of maintaining order and tranquility while ensuring the freedom of the press.

The history of the Cape Colony is marked by a series of such conflicts between the government and the press. These conflicts have often been the cause of public disorder and have led to the suppression of freedom of speech.

It is to be hoped that the Cape Government will be able to find a solution to this problem that will ensure the maintenance of order and tranquility while ensuring the freedom of the press.
