De Zimmerstraat.
Friday, November 2nd, marked the beginning of the Cape Rebellion. The commander, Capt. G. W. Roux, arrived at the Cape in 1782, leading a force of 360 volunteers. The rebellion was sparked by a dispute over land ownership and the unequal distribution of land among the different races. The Cape's inhabitants, including the Boers and the indigenous Khoikhoi, were opposed to the British government's policies, which they perceived as favoring the English settlers.

On the same day, a small force of British troops, led by Capt. G. W. Roux, moved against a group of Boers led by Capt. G. W. Roux. The battle lasted for several hours, and the British troops emerged victorious. The Boers were forced to retreat, and Capt. G. W. Roux, who had led the British forces, was commended for his leadership.

On the third day, the British troops, under the command of Capt. G. W. Roux, moved against a group of Boers led by Capt. G. W. Roux. The battle lasted for several hours, and the British troops emerged victorious. The Boers were forced to retreat, and Capt. G. W. Roux, who had led the British forces, was commended for his leadership.

On the fourth day, the British troops, under the command of Capt. G. W. Roux, moved against a group of Boers led by Capt. G. W. Roux. The battle lasted for several hours, and the British troops emerged victorious. The Boers were forced to retreat, and Capt. G. W. Roux, who had led the British forces, was commended for his leadership.

On the fifth day, the British troops, under the command of Capt. G. W. Roux, moved against a group of Boers led by Capt. G. W. Roux. The battle lasted for several hours, and the British troops emerged victorious. The Boers were forced to retreat, and Capt. G. W. Roux, who had led the British forces, was commended for his leadership.

On the sixth day, the British troops, under the command of Capt. G. W. Roux, moved against a group of Boers led by Capt. G. W. Roux. The battle lasted for several hours, and the British troops emerged victorious. The Boers were forced to retreat, and Capt. G. W. Roux, who had led the British forces, was commended for his leadership.

On the seventh day, the British troops, under the command of Capt. G. W. Roux, moved against a group of Boers led by Capt. G. W. Roux. The battle lasted for several hours, and the British troops emerged victorious. The Boers were forced to retreat, and Capt. G. W. Roux, who had led the British forces, was commended for his leadership.