

THE

INDEPENDENT MEDIA COMMISSION

In the interest of free and fair elections, the Independent Media Commission was established to monitor all TV and radio stations to check that broadcasters treat all political parties fairly.

The Commission also monitors state financed publications and state information services throughout South Africa, the homelands and self-governing territories to make sure that government resources are not being used to advance the interests of any political party.

The Independent Media Commission is made up of people with a high standing in society, who represent a wide cross-section of the community. It is independent from government and political parties.

The Commission will hold public hearings to investigate complaints and has the power to take action against anyone who violates the Act.

Should you have any reason to suspect that your party is not being fairly treated, take the matter to your political party representative who can report it to the Independent Media Commission for investigation.
