PREFACE.

THE great value of the file of The Times as a repository of material for recent history has stimulated the industry of index-makers. This index is offered as a supplementary aid to research: it includes a longer period than Palmer's or Bailey's in the single volume, and is confined to more select material; it also gives clues not found in these useful compilations.

The reference to the leading article will furnish the clue of date, and approximate date, to the daily indexes for other material on the same subject.

Articles not referring to proper names are omitted, and when several are referred to in the same article only one is entered.

The manuscript from which this instalment is selected was commenced fifteen years ago, and is continued to date. Each quinquennium consists of four parts. Those not yet published for 1896—1900 are:—

Part II.—PLACES (geographically arranged).

Part III.—SOURCES.

Part IV.—SUBJECTS (logically classified).

THE HISTORY OF THE LONDON TRADING COMPANY

The first charter of the London Trading Company was granted by King Henry VIII in the year 1554. The charter gave the company the right to trade with the East Indies, and to establish a factory in the city of London. The company was organized as a corporation, and its members were known as the "Gentlemen of the Company". The company's first voyage to the East Indies was made in the year 1595, and it was during this voyage that the company discovered the East India trade.

The company's trade with the East Indies was highly profitable, and it soon became one of the most important sources of revenue for the English government. The company's success was due to its monopoly of the East India trade, and to its ability to raise large amounts of capital from the public.

The company's trade with the East Indies was not without its difficulties. The company's ships were often attacked by pirates, and the company's trade was sometimes disrupted by wars between England and other European powers. Despite these difficulties, the company's trade with the East Indies continued to grow, and it remained one of the most important sources of revenue for the English government.

The company's trade with the East Indies was also a source of controversy. Some people believed that the company's monopoly of the East India trade was unfair, and that it should be broken up. Others believed that the company's trade was essential for the English government's revenue, and that it should be maintained.

The company's trade with the East Indies was a major factor in the development of the English economy. The company's success in the East India trade helped to establish London as a major financial center, and it also helped to create a large class of wealthy merchants and investors.
