THE ZUID-AFRIKAAN.

Cape Town, January 8, 1867.

Two proposed schemes of building a harbour by convict labor have created a good deal of excitement, especially among the Dutch authorities, which is in the process of a project that appears to be the logical extension of the work begun under the late Government. It is proposed to extend the existing jetty at the entrance to the harbor, and to build a breakwater of masonry on the south side of the entrance, with a depth of water of 20 feet at mid-tide. The cost of this work is estimated at £20,000, and the work is expected to be completed within the next two years.

The scheme has met with considerable opposition, however, from the Cape Government, who are of the opinion that the work is unnecessary and that the funds would be better spent on other projects. The Cape Government also argues that the existing jetty is adequate, and that the additional breakwater would be of little benefit.

The proposal has been supported by the Dutch authorities, who believe that it is essential for the economic development of the Cape. They argue that the additional breakwater would provide a more secure anchorage for ships, and that it would also enhance the port's capacity for trade.

A compromise has been proposed, which involves building the breakwater in stages, with the first stage costing £10,000. This has been accepted by both the Dutch and Cape Governments, and work is expected to begin soon.

In the meantime, the existing jetty is being maintained and repaired, and steps are being taken to improve the navigational aids in the harbor.
