

The Zulu Affair—\(\sum_{n=0}^{\infty} \frac{1}{n!} \cdot (\text{G. W. N.})^n\)

Cape Town, Jan. 2, 1870.

It is about a time-honored custom, with public writers, to begin a new year by indulging in a flattering anticipation of the best intentions of the people, and to devote some time to the preparation of a stump speech, in which they argue that, if they are not called upon to lead the people in the year to come, they will do so in the next. But we are of the opinion that there is something better than this. We believe that the people are not calling upon us to lead them in the year to come, but that they are calling upon some other people. We believe that the people are calling upon some other people to lead them in the year to come.

The people will not be called upon to lead the people in the year to come, but they will be called upon to lead the people in the year to come, because they are called upon to lead the people in the year to come.

The people will not be called upon to lead the people in the year to come, but they will be called upon to lead the people in the year to come, because they are called upon to lead the people in the year to come.

The people will not be called upon to lead the people in the year to come, but they will be called upon to lead the people in the year to come, because they are called upon to lead the people in the year to come.

The people will not be called upon to lead the people in the year to come, but they will be called upon to lead the people in the year to come, because they are called upon to lead the people in the year to come.

The people will not be called upon to lead the people in the year to come, but they will be called upon to lead the people in the year to come, because they are called upon to lead the people in the year to come.

The people will not be called upon to lead the people in the year to come, but they will be called upon to lead the people in the year to come, because they are called upon to lead the people in the year to come.

The people will not be called upon to lead the people in the year to come, but they will be called upon to lead the people in the year to come, because they are called upon to lead the people in the year to come.

The people will not be called upon to lead the people in the year to come, but they will be called upon to lead the people in the year to come, because they are called upon to lead the people in the year to come.

The people will not be called upon to lead the people in the year to come, but they will be called upon to lead the people in the year to come, because they are called upon to lead the people in the year to come.
